

Brand identity page — worksheet

For the standalone brand identity page, separate from your product/UX case studies. Repeat the project block below for each brand project you add (Eagle Quality first, others later).

Page intro (one short paragraph, sets up what this page is and why it exists — e.g. “brand identity and visual systems work, separate from product/UX case studies”)

Project block (repeat per project)

Project name: Your role: (full ownership / some input / self-initiated redesign) One-line context: what the project was, who it was for

Positioning note — one or two sentences on the brand’s audience/industry/tone, so palette and type choices have a reason behind them, not just aesthetic preference

The system

Logo suite

- Primary mark:
- Alternate/secondary lockups:
- Icon-only mark:
- Variations available (color / mono / reversed):

Color palette

- Primary color(s) and what they’re used for:
- Accent color(s) and what they’re used for:
- Neutral(s):

Typography

- Body face:

- Notes on hierarchy/usage:

Patterns or graphic elements (skip if none)

The system in the world

List each real-world application you have or plan to create, with a one-line caption for each (context helps — “on the building facade,” “on the crew’s hats,” not isolated on white):

- Signage:
- Apparel (hats, uniforms):
- Packaging:
- Vehicle wrap (truck/van):
- Other:

Digital application

- Landing page / website design — what it needs to communicate, and whether it exists yet or needs to be designed:

Genuine hard call (optional — only if one exists)

If there was a real constraint or rejected direction in the brand work (existing brand equity to respect, a color that doesn’t reproduce well on wrap material, industry expectations that limited options), capture it the same way as a case study decision:

- Problem:
- First attempt:
- Final direction:
- Why:

Notes for next pass

- Keep per-piece rationale short — a caption, not a full decision block, unless it’s the “genuine hard call” above.
- Real-world mockups should show the identity in context, not isolated on white.

- Add a new "project block" section for each additional brand project.
