

A few questions about the Eagle Quality site

I'm putting together a design project around the Eagle Quality site and want to make sure it's grounded in what actually matters for the business, not just what looks nice. No pressure on length, a sentence or two per question is plenty.

1. What made you want a redesign in the first place — was something not working, or did it just feel dated?

2. Where do most customers or inquiries come from today (referrals, search, word of mouth, repeat customers)? Does the current site actually help with that, or do people mostly bypass it?

3. Is there anything about the business — custom work, tolerances, industries you serve, certifications — that you feel the current site undersells or doesn't show at all?

4. If someone lands on the site and doesn't reach out, why do you think that happens?

5. Who's usually looking at the site — other businesses sourcing a machining partner, engineers, one-off customers, someone else?

6. Is there a competitor or another company's site (in any industry) whose site you think does this well?

7. Anything else about the business you wish more people knew, that the current site doesn't get across?

Thanks — this helps a lot.
